INTRODUCTION

This bibliography is intended as a guide to the materials available for the study of Uganda's recent history and politics with particular reference to the years since the Amin coup in 1971. It arose originally out of my research on Uganda and began as a compilation of my own holdings which include a good deal of little known material that I decided would be of interest to other scholars as well. My awareness also of the need to situate the Amin years in the context of Uganda's longer history, combined with the absence of any comprehensive bibliography of secondary sources for the years since independence in 1962, persuaded me, however, to expand it to include both those earlier materials as well as more recent secondary works that I have myself consulted.

Most of the historical sources will be well-known to students of Uganda. So far as secondary works and the colonial period are concerned, the guide is not intended therefore to be exhaustive. It does include all such material that I have found relevant in any way to an understanding of political, social and economic changes of the period 1940-1988, and for charting continuity as well as change from colonial to post-colonial state.

More recent source materials, especially for the years since 1971, are likely to be less well known. As far as possible therefore all published official sources, and all other locally published and unpublished materials for the period since 1971 and up to 1988, have been included.

Official materials have been listed by category of publication: official publications, government and non government; international agencies; and political parties. Uganda government publications up to 1979 are listed chronologically within the categories used by the Government Printer's Catalogue 1966; from 1979 they are listed chronologically without reference to departmental category. For Government publications I have followed the form of citation used in Uganda, Subject Guide to Official Publications compiled by Beverly Ann Gray (Library of Congress 1977), which is the most complete bibliography of government publications I have discovered. Books, journal articles, occasional and unpublished papers are listed in alphabetical order. The range and quantity of the journal material made it sensible, for my purposes, to separate it chronologically in terms of content into three periods: up to 1971; 1971-1979; 1979-. There is necessarily some overlap, and the division is not altogether satisfactory, so that in a small number of cases an entry appears in more than one section. Hopefully, however, it concentrates attention on each phase. A limited number of journalistic items from weekly and monthly magazines and journals has been included with articles. It became clear however at a very early date that it was impossible to include all such material and I have not attempted to do so. The list of theses similarly is a partial list, so that it is good to know that the Deputy Librarian of Makerere University Library is in the process of compiling a complete list of all dissertations on Uganda. Finally the section on the press is essentially a preliminary checklist and will be elaborated elsewhere in due course.
